

Jack of all trades, master of none.

They say it like it's a flaw, like versatility is a sin,
like knowing a little of everything means belonging nowhere.

I speak many languages of survival, too loud for the quiet rooms, too quiet for the ones that scream.

Every circle feels borrowed, every seat feels temporary.

I laugh at the right moments, nod at the right truths,
yet something in me remains standing while everyone else sits.

Maybe I was never meant to fit in, maybe I was built to move, to observe from edges, to be the bridge that people cross but never stay on...
